Heidelberg and its Students.

The town of Heidelberg itself merits much consideration. It is a very pretty and quaint city, and a favorable resort with many strangers; it has numerous and thriving manufacturing; and a population of twenty thousand people; and more than that, it can boast of a university which is two hundred years old. The edifice itself is an unattractive, dingy building, five stories, with a bell-tower on the top of the roof, and the interior is as bare and unadorned as the outside. The rooms are without comforts and entirely devoted to lectures. As has well been said, "Money here has not been invested in bricks, but in brains." Heidelberg has enjoyed a high reputation for its lectures in law, natural science and philosophy. At one time it numbered about one hundred professors and about twelve hundred students, but its numbers are decreasing. This may be due to the impetus and diversion which the Emperor William has made in favor of the universities at Strasburg and Berlin, or it may be somewhat occasioned by a dislike to the cruel and wretched custom of duel-fighting that exists. More than half of the stalwart-looking young men that we saw walking in the streets and lounging in the shops had their faces cut and scarred in the most dreadful manner. It is a time-honored practice, and, although there is a law against it, it is not enforced. The students are all divided into classes or clubs, and each club is distinguished by the color of the cape—orange, crimson, blue, etc. The clubs are sworn foes to each other, and seek occasions to offer a challenge for duel. This is accomplished by the sword, with which they are privileged to strike the face, while the other parts of the body are well protected from injury. The clubs attend their partisans, and arbitrate as to the justice of the sword-play. The more duels a young man can boast of and the more scars he can show, the greater the estimate of his courage, but to an unprejudiced mind the whole thing seems a relic of barbarism, and should not be tolerated.
